

Police may have thought Knox was quirky, but until she admitted being in the cottage during Meredith's murder, she remained a witness, not a suspect

The Italian Supreme Court has confirmed Knox's "calunnia" conviction. "Calunnia" is more than simply slander, it is making false declarations against someone that alter the course of justice

The ECHR makes clear it is not a Court of Appeal for national criminal or domestic cases

Today, my lawyers filed an appeal of my slander conviction with the European Court of Human Rights. My slander conviction was based on comments I made regarding Patrick Lumumba...comments that were coerced during a lengthy interrogation by Perugia police shortly before I was arrested in 2007. The interrogation took place in a language I barely spoke, without a lawyer present, and without the police informing me that I was a suspect in Meredith's murder, which was a violation of my human rights. The police were the ones who first brought forth Patrick's name saying they knew I was going to meet him the night of Meredith Kercher's murder which was not true. I have stated many times that my original comments about Patrick were coerced by the police and not true.

Knox doesn't mention she was assisted in this questioning by Anna Donnino, an interpreter

As soon as Knox admitted being present during the murder, she became a suspect, questioning was halted as she now needed a lawyer. By law that admission wouldn't be used against her in court.

With Knox's questioning halted, by the next morning she had a court-appointed lawyer and received the documentation accrediting her suspect status.

Knox contradicts her courtroom testimony where she admitted that police did not introduce Patrick's name into the questioning.

It's hard to believe Knox saying she clarified that her accusation against Patrick was coerced: she let him sit in jail for nearly a month before announcing her regret.
